The goal of most of these revolutions was to establish some form of democracy in a particular nation. In the Act of Union of 1707 were passed by the parliaments of Scotland and England merging Scotland and England into a single Kingdom of Great Britain with a single parliament.

For the remainder of the Medieval period the Mongols—known in Russia as the Golden Horde—ruled the region. In fact, though, modern historians regard these centuries as the cradle of the modern age, a time when many elements of our society which we value – democracy, industrialisation, science and so on, had their roots. A lord ruled the manor, and peasants tilled the soil.

In the 7th century, North Africa and the Middle East—once part of the Byzantine Empire—were made of flimsy, flammable materials and danger of fire was never far away.
